ABSTRACT

An Ibanag-English Dictionary May 1969

Directed by: Dr. Earl Jones

An Ibanag-English Dictionary is the first known study of its kind on the Ibanag language. Ibanag is spoken in the provinces of Isabela and Cagayan in the northeastern part of Luzon, Philippines. It appears to have had its origin in the lower Cagayan River valley, but it became the high-prestige lingua franca of most of the valley people, used first in trade and later in governmental and mission work.

Like all other "native" languages of the Philippines, Ibanag belongs to the Malayo-Polynesian or Austronesian family, which includes all the native languages of Oceania except those classified as Papuan, Negrito, or Australian. This family is divided into three main divisions: Indonesian, Melanesian, and Polynesian. Philippine languages are of the Indonesian division, as are most of the languages spoken by the peoples of the Malay Peninsula, Madagascar, and Indonesia.

This dictionary, which aims at practicality, includes vocabulary that would find use in everyday situations. The data used were gathered from the following sources: Ibanag written materials, translations from English materials, and taped conversations on varied topics with newly-arrived informants of different ages from various walks of life presently residing in different parts of Texas. The writer, who is herself a native speaker of Ibanag, also served as informant.

Entry words, in the form that the student would encounter in both spoken and written Ibanag, are arranged in the Roman alphabet order. Each entry includes pronunciation in International Phonetic Alphabet phonemic transcription, part of speech, and one or more meanings or English equivalents. Entries of some words further include the language of immediate derivation when such information is available. Insofar as is known, entries without language derivation labels are Ibanag. It is probable, however, that some of these were borrowed so far in the past that their derivation cannot be determined from current sources. Entries of animal names give English equivalents, as do most of those of plant names. When English equivalents of certain plants are not available, however, only botanical names are given.

The dictionary contains 3,641 entry words. Of these, 1,886 are immediately derived from Spanish, 53 from English, 3 from Tagalog, 3 from Cantonese, 2 from Malay, 1 from Bicol, and 1 from Japanese.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENT

The writer would like to express her appreciation for the continued assistance and encouragement of all her professors, but particularly of those who served on her graduate committee: Dr. Earl Jones, Dr. Walter A. Varvel, Mr. Dan R. Davis, Dr. Charles E. McCandless, and Dr. Edward C. Breitenkamp.

The PACE division of the U.S. Office of Education, through a Title III grant to the Bryan Independent School District and Texas A&M University, provided an opportunity for the researcher to work in Programa de Educación Interamericana. This financial assistance is deeply appreciated.

Finally, to Dr. Ramon A. Ibarbia, the writer's husband, a special note of thanks for his encouragement and help throughout the process of data collection and presentation.

PREFACE

This dictionary aims primarily at utility. The words included are those that would find use in everyday situations, and are in the form that a student would encounter in both written and spoken Ibanag. To facilitate the use of the dictionary and to make it more helpful to the student, the section, Explanatory Notes, details the arrangement of main entries followed, the functional labels and symbols used, and briefly, some important features of Ibanag pronunciation, morphology, syntax, and orthography. Keys to symbols and abbreviations are provided. The Introduction gives a brief history of the Ibanag language.

Readers who know Spanish are cautioned not to expect that Spanish-derived words in the Ibanag language will have their original meanings. They rarely have all the general connotations. In fact, some Spanish loan words have acquired totally new meanings.

In so far as this is known this is the first Ibanag-English dictionary ever compiled, and while it is by no means exhaustive and complete, it should prove useful to the English-speaking student who wishes to learn Ibanag. Some important words may have been omitted due to human error and the limits of time for the research, but if this dictionary should serve as a springboard for a more comprehensive study, then it will have been worthwhile.

EXPLANATORY NOTES

The brief explanatory notes given below are intended to make the dictionary more useful to the student and to facilitate its use. Some information in the entries which may not seem clear may be made so by a careful reading of these notes.

1. Arrangement of entry words

1.1 The entry words are arranged alphabetically following the Roman alphabet order. Variants in vocabulary are introduced by Also at the end of the entries and are reentered at their own alphabetical places.

1.2 Variants in pronunciation are placed one after the other between two virgules, and separated by a semicolon. The presence of a variant simply indicates two pronunciations of the entry word, one no more preferable than the other.

1.3 Some nouns have different plural forms. These plural forms are entered at their own alphabetical places, as are masculine and feminine forms.

1.4 The entry words of verbs are presented in the infinitive form, the same form as the present and the future. The past form is different. For this reason, past forms are entered at their own alphabetical places.

2. Functional labels and symbols

2.1 Virgules rather than brackets are used to enclose the phonemic transcriptions of pronunciation and the stress mark (an apostrophe seemed the practical thing to use here) is placed before the stressed syllable following the International Phonetic Association practice. Syllables are separated by single spaces.

2.2 An abbreviation in parenthesis immediately following the pronunciation indicates language of derivation. Note, however, that this symbol indicates the language from which the word was immediately borrowed, not the original language in which it appeared. Thus, auto, although Greek in origin, is listed as English since it applies only to the motor car and was introduced by Americans. The keys to abbreviations are given under the section, Keys to Symbols and Abbreviations.

2.3 The part of speech is indicated by an abbreviation immediately preceding the meaning or English equivalent of the entry word. If an entry word may be classified as two parts of speech, the first part of speech label is preceded by 1. and the second by 2. with the meaning or English equivalent given after each label. If, however, the meaning or English equivalent is the same form for both parts of speech, the two labels are combined.

economia /i ko no 'mi ya/ (Sp) 1. n. economy 2. adj. economical; thrifty pitu /pi 'tu/ n. & adj. seven. Also siete.

2.4 A semicolon is used to separate the different meanings or English equivalents of an entry word and the variants in pronunciation, as stated above. The comma is used as it is commonly used in prose.

2.5 In addition to its use in etymology, the parenthesis is also used for words or phrases that amplify the meanings or English equivalents.

curegan /ku 'rɛ gan/ vt. to cause a slight movement or change of position (of sand, ground, grains, etc.)

2.6 Capitalization is used with names of countries and the natives of these countries. Only those countries which have equivalents in Ibanag (generally loan words from Spanish) are included in the dictionary.

Capitalization is further used with words traditionally capitalized in Ibanag, like Hostia, and also words classified as interjections.

Ara -- Hurry! Faster!

Adios -- Goodbye!

Hombre -- Man!

3. Pronunciation

3.1 An apostrophe placed before a syllable indicates the stressed syllable, as stated earlier. The stress pattern of Ibanag has only one relatively prominent syllable in a word, generally the penultimate or the final. In context the stress shifts. One may hear only one relatively prominent syllable in utterance, no matter how many syllables, and this may generally be the penultimate or the final syllable. Stress does not seem to be as important in Ibanag as it is in English in which stress may determine meaning as in pro 'test and 'pro test, re 'cord and 're cord.

3.2 A very distinctive feature of Ibanag phonology is the double consonant. Except in the case of some Spanish loan words containing double l, double consonants in Ibanag are phonemic, as may be seen in the following examples:

- a. maporay /ma 'po rʌi/ adj. stern; wont to scold mapporay /map 'po rʌi/ vi. to get angry; to scold
- b. magagal /ma ga 'gal/ vt. to call (somebody) maggagal /mag gʌg 'gʌl/ vt. to cut with a saw

There is a juncture between the double consonants.

3.3 When one pronunciation of a word serves as two or more parts of speech, only one entry is made. When the pronunciation changes for different meanings, separate entries are made.

4. Morphology

4.1 Many verbs in Ibanag are formed by prefixing ma to nouns. Such verbs form the past tense by changing m to n. Other verbs are formed by suffixing an to nouns. These verbs form their past tense by infixing in and dropping the an. If the present form begins with a vowel sound, the in is prefixed. Still other verbs are formed by prefixing i to the noun. These verbs form the past tense by prefixing ne or ni to the noun. Examples are given below. All verbs in Ibanag have the same present, future, and infinitive forms. The same form is used for both singular and plural subjects. This amount of information in each entry would be cumbersome and would only tend to clutter the entry.

- a. magunnug -- to accumulate; to collect; to amass

- nagunnug -- accumulated; collected; amassed
- b. bibbigan -- to read
binibbig -- read
- c. itabba -- to promise
netabba -- promised

4.2 Singular and plural nouns have the same form. Plurality is indicated by adding ira after a noun. Y before a word indicates that the word is a noun, singular or plural.

- y lappao -- the flower
y lappao ira -- the flowers

4.3 There are some nouns that form their plurals irregularly, some adjectives that may be used only with plural nouns, and verbs that may be used only with three or more persons or things. There are very few of these exceptions and they are simply so indicated in their respective entries.

5. Syntax

These notes are not intended as a grammar but merely as a brief explanation to aid comprehension of the dictionary entries. Those interested are referred to Pedro Nolasco de Medio's Ibanag-Spanish grammar (14).

5.1 In Ibanag, the subject generally comes after the predicate. The different verb forms discussed above go with specific subjects. In other words, predicate-subject forms may be said to be bound.

For the verb to find:

a. ma magaleg nga (I)	magaleg cami (we)
magaleg ca (you)	magaleg camu (you)
magaleg yaya (he, she)	magaleg ira (they)
b. an alegac cu (I)	alegam mi (we)
alegam mu (you)	alegan nu (you)
alegan na (he, she)	alegad da (they)

Note that the final n in the verb is replaced by the initial letter of the succeeding word. See 6.1.

For the verb to include:

ilagum cu (I)	ilagum mi (we)
ilagum mu (you)	ilagum nu (you)
ilagum na (he, she)	ilagum da (they)

5.2 When the subject is a proper noun:

magaleg si Jose	magaleg da Jose (Jose and others)
alegan ni Jose	alegad da Jose (Jose and others)
ilagum ni Jose	ilagum da Jose (Jose and others)

6. Orthography

6.1 Ibanag orthography has a certain distinctive feature which has already been illustrated in 5.1a above. This is true not only with an verbs, but also with any word ending in n. For instance, cofun (friend) becomes:

cofuc cu (my friend)	cofum mi (our friend)
cofum mu (your friend)	cofun nu (your friend)
cofun na (his, her friend)	cofud da (their friend)

INTRODUCTION

Ibanag is spoken by approximately a million people in the provinces of Isabela and Cagayan in the northeastern part of the island of Luzon, Philippines. Some people in the area speak other languages, such as Gaddang, Yogad, Itawes, and Iraya, but they generally speak Ibanag as a second language, it being the high-prestige lingua franca (11, p. 264). In fact, it is not uncommon to meet native speakers of other languages who disclaim knowledge of their native tongue and claim to be native speakers of Ibanag (11, p. 298). The Negritos, or Atta, who live mainly in the mountain regions of Isabela and Cagayan, and who are mostly non-Christian and semi-nomadic, have had considerable contact with Ibanag and their speech includes a great number of Ibanag loan words, as do the other languages previously mentioned.

The Ibanags appear to have had their origin in the lower Cagayan River valley, but as Ibanag became the lingua franca of most of the valley people, used first in trade and later in governmental and mission work, "this led to the Ibanagization, so to speak, of many groups who were formerly of other ethnic affiliation, at the same time that they were Christianized and Hispanized" (11, p. 331).

Like all other "native" languages of the Philippines, Ibanag belongs to the Malayo-Polynesian family, which includes most of the languages of Oceania, except those classified as Papuan, Negrito, or Australian. This family has three main divisions: Indonesian, Melanesian, and Polynesian. Philippine languages are of the Indonesian division, as are most of the languages spoken by the peoples of the Malay Peninsula, Madagascar, and Indonesia.

Methodology

A review of literature reveals that there is no Ibanag-English dictionary available. The early Spanish missionaries in Isabela and Cagayan studied Ibanag and published many of their works. The outstanding Ayer Collection of Philippine linguistics at the Newberry Library in Chicago (25) includes some of these. Among others, there is an Ibanag-Spanish dictionary (2), a Spanish-Ibanag dictionary (20), a Spanish grammar written in Ibanag (14), which is also to be found in the United States Library of Congress, and a translation from Latin to Ibanag of sermons from the gospel (21). A translation of the New Testament from English to Ibanag by the Philippine Agency for the American Bible Society (18) is also in the collection. Certain contemporary linguistic studies have been made which treat Ibanag briefly. These are Calimag (3), Healey (9), Oates & Oates (17), and Pittman (19).

This dictionary aims at utility and includes practical, everyday Ibanag words. The data used were obtained from the following sources: Ibanag published and unpublished materials in diversified fields (14, 19, 23), translations from English materials, and taped conversations with informants of different ages from various walks of life presently residing in different parts of Texas. They include seven young women, two elderly men, and four young men, all of whom have arrived in the United States since October, 1967. Words encountered in these sources were included, with no attempts made to be prescriptive. The writer, who is herself a native speaker of Ibanag, also served as an informant.

The dictionaries of Cassell (5), Cuyas (6), and the Real Academia (22) were used as references for Spanish-derived words; Webster's dictionary (24) was used as reference for English meanings and equivalents. Entries of animal names give the English equivalents, as do most of those of plant names. Certain plants have no English equivalents available and only their botanical names are given. Blanco (1) was used as reference for botanical names. These plants could have been described in terms of their characteristics, but since several plants share similar traits, doing so probably would have confused rather than helped the student. Details of procedure followed in the body of the dictionary are given in the Explanatory Notes.
